Case studies: How can the arts and creativity support people who are shielding or vulnerable during Covid-19?

Letters in Lockdown
Coram
National (based in London)

Introduction
Letters in Lockdown was a series of six creative writing workshops, delivered in partnership between Coram and the Royal Literary Fund via Zoom. Coram was originally founded in 1739 as “The Foundling Hospital” and participants explored material from the organisation’s historic archive and used it as inspiration to write their own letters, on a different theme each week. This included writing letters to people who have influenced them, discussing how Covid19 has impacted them and their hopes and aspirations for the future. The participants also experimented with “mail art” to add additional layers of meaning to their work. Alongside the workshops, we held 5 “drop in” sessions, where participants could share their work, receive feedback from the peers and receive support. At the end of the project, an additional celebration session was held where participants shared their completed letters with senior representatives from Coram, the Royal Literary Fund and each other. The letters are being posted/couriered to Coram (one is a letter in a bottle so could not go through the normal post) and will be displayed once lockdown has sufficiently eased. The pieces will also be incorporated into our “Story of Care” website, which will be relaunched early in 2021.

The writing tutor was funded by the Royal Literary Fund. Organisation, sourcing of archive material and session facilitation was done by Coram staff, as part of the NLHF project, “Voices Through Time: The Story of Care”.

What have been the challenges and successes for you?
This content is free to access and can be shared with wide audiences. We know some of the dance content has been shared as far afield as Australia. Challenges include the artists learning to use new technology and adapt their approaches to work from home and in front of a camera for the digital content. It needed to be high quality content AND make for good viewing quality and this took effort and practice. Success include reaching greater numbers for workshops than we would have done if it was a group meeting.
